Detection of novel cryptic insertion sites of the UP1, a non-essential yeast transposon. The yeast insertion mutant S1011 was isolated from a large-scale mutagenesis project. Here we report that this mutant shows transpositional hyperactivity, or enhanced transposition of the yeast transposon, UP1, by an unknown mechanism. Complementation tests suggest that the mutant phenotype is caused by the loss of a gene that encodes a product with an unknown function. Southern hybridization analysis showed that the mutant has lost a small region from chromosome XIII. Sequence analysis of the flanking region of the interrupted ORF revealed a deletion of a single nucleotide. Detailed sequence analysis of the interrupted ORF revealed a perfect alignment of the UP1 transposon sequence and revealed an insertion of 1 bp in a conserved region of the interrupted ORF. Synthetic anions and their use in nucleotide binding proteins. This report summarizes a three year collaboration between us and several research groups. Our group synthesized a series of anions. All anions were covalently coupled to the sulfhydryl groups on protein, some with excellent retention of activity. Several were designed to mimic natural phosphates and the rates of exchange and rates of rebinding to protein were measured. These rates of exchange were strikingly different from those of phosphate. These studies led to the conclusion

An original short story by Tom V. Bonk (Tom Wilkins) Life in the outdoors is anything but easy. It comes down to whether you or your pride is held most dear. This story is about a guy that had to deal with kicking his pride to the side. "Where'd you get that flesh wound?" "The knife?" "No, the other one." "I got it in the battle with the assassins." The tall, black horned man stretched the curly black hair over his head, throwing back his massive black mustaches. Huge black eyes peered out from behind fiercely sharp brows. Heavy bronze skin was covered with a thin mat of hair. His body was covered in large scars. A vest covered his huge tank top. Set with rifles, pistols and special looking daggers, they could be said to be just as deadly. The other man was made more so. All that he'd carried in his pack was gone save a few firearms. But he was still banded and muscled, showing why he was still in the Marines. His brown hair, crinkled over, was more brittle than that of the dark one. "Thanks, Jax," Mike said, using his weathered looking, ruined hands to stop the bleeding. "Just try to keep it clean," Jax replied. Mike knelt over the woman. "You saw anything?" Mike called. "Just the end of the trail," Ruby said. "There wasn't any sign that anyone else had passed. So I thought it was safe to come in." "Yeah, for now," Mike said, standing up. "I'm going to go check what cover is ahead." "I'll try to make sure the camp isn't breached." Mike waved a hand in acknowledgement. A team was not just a team. There was no reason to push your luck. Mike looked out into the dim purple sky. It was hazy today, lacking in the sharper daylight that would add to his comfort. But something was drawing to his sight. There was a flash of white, like a familiar sign. He frowned and looked out into the semi
