The issue was identified as not reproducible with a limited number of "older" Windows 10 editions (down to the November 2018 update). As a result, a small number of Windows 10 editions that may or may not have been deployed to some users were affected by this issue. As a result, Microsoft reached out to ISVs for the affected editions and ISVs confirmed that they do not plan to deploy the affected editions. When Windows XP came out, it was a hit with the world. It was the first OS to be sold with a free upgrade to Windows Vista. It also included many features that were widely regarded as the best in the market. However, there were a few flaws that Microsoft wanted to address, so it released Windows XP Service Pack 2 (XP SP2). This service pack, in addition to adding a number of useful features, added an updated graphics driver and made a number of improvements to Windows Explorer. Although Windows XP was a success in the market, it was also the first generation of Windows to be ended. The life cycle of the OS was over five years, and the price was lowered in 2009. With the release of Windows 7, a new operating system was released, based on the NT kernel. Windows 7 was a new Windows OS with a completely new UI. It was a significant update over Windows XP, giving it a new user interface and new features. Despite the changes, the performance of Windows 7 was just as fast as Windows XP. Following the release of Windows 8, Microsoft announced Windows 8.1 as a free update for Windows 8 users. It added many new features, such as a modern UI, the return of the Start menu, and more. However, the user interface of Windows 8.1 was not as well received as the new Windows 8 UI. One of the most significant changes is the support for multiple users and the return of the classic desktop UI.
